As an individual with huge curiosity towards everything, I proactively look for different opportunities to facilitate the dialogue between myself with my society, as well as the entire world. Community servicing, as always emphasised by my parents since I was little in family education, is the way suits me to learn and understand the surroundings. Two main elements trigger my passion on servicing, are to be inspired and to share.

To be Inspired: Listen, What the World is Going to Tell Us

I love interacting with people from all walks of life, listening to their unique stories which gives me the sense of experiencing a brand-new vision towards the world, and towards myself. One of the major motivations for me to participate in various scopes of community servicing is the desire to jump out of my routine mindsets and comfort zone, to learn and know more. My 2-year journey in AIESEC offered me with the opportunities to communicate with youth from diversified backgrounds. In fact, comparing to young people from other countries or regions, I am more impressed while chatting with locals who have totally different growth backgrounds with me, recognising differentiations between us who live in the same city and general culture is always appealing to me.

To Share: It is My Turn to be the Storyteller

For storytelling or human library, I used to have the assumption that the speaker should be a successful figure who can inspire and impact a huge amount of people with their charisma or achievements. I am grateful that the services I participated in have changed my point of view on this. As a student ambassador of Jockey Club Museum of Climate Change, I always receive questions from children, asking me why we should adopt low-carbon lifestyle. I tend to ask for their perspectives on this, followed by sharing my belief that “Many a little make a mickle”.

In my experience in the conference team of Youth to Sustainability Summit 2021 as a Session Facilitator, I was responsible in designing education sessions and delivering reflective messages on personal growth and future planning. I managed to share some key struggles and choices I came across in the past with all the secondary school participants as a person who walked past the difficulties and confusion they were facing by then. Through joining community services, I realise that we need not be perfect to share and express, the differences between us are always the core elements to make these events and discourses meaningful. If my story could bring slight inspiration for one audience, I would be more than proud, which I am doing what others I met in the past have done to me, to lend others a helping hand whenever needed.

Specifically, I would like to express my deepest gratitude for the support and recognition from the CUHK Convocation on the Outstanding Community Services Award. It is my pleasure to be nominated by my college, CW Chu College, and I am more than grateful to be selected by the panel as the recipient of the scholarship for the 2021/22 academic year. To me, community servicing is no longer only the tacit bonding between me and my parents, but also the approach to know more about myself, to grow and to progress.

During my term as the Local Committee Vice President of Incoming Global Talent in AIESEC in CUHK, my team organised an Induction Conference for all new members. The photo was taken in the human library session, which I was sharing my story on different choices made in the university with my audience.

I participated the Global Volunteer programme organised by AIESEC in May-June 2022, which I joined the Speaking Club of a local language school in Isparta of Turkey. The photo was taken on our last day, with the teacher and a student in the language school, as well as other Experience Participants.
